Sugar from Corn-Stalks.

To the Editors of the Disputch: I have seen in the Dispatch recently two articles on "Sugar from Corn-Stalks," in the last one of which it was stated that Dr. Collier, of the Department of Agriculture, was experimenting in making sugar from corn-stalks and sorghum. The amount of juice and syrup of each was given, but it was not stated that sugar was actually made from either, only that this syrup contains seventy-five per cent. of its weight in sugar. Nor was the flavor of the syrups mentioned. Sugar was made from corn-stalks as early as the Revolutionary war, if not before; but the faste was so disagrecable that it was of no value, and it was abanboned. During the late war, in 1864, I met with an article on the subject in some paper or book. I cannot tell where now, in which it was stated that this bad taste was confined to the joints, which, if cut out, the remainder of the stalk would yield a juice from which very good sugar could be made. Having failed in all my efforts to make sugar from sorghum, I determined to try cornstalks, which I did in the fall of that year on a small scale. I succeeded without any difficulty in making a bright syrup, which, after standing some time, granulated, depositing a fair amount of light brown sugar, though not as much as indicated by Dr. Collins's estimate. There was no disagreeable taste about the syrup or sugar; both were very palatable. My experiment was made without taking any note of the quantity of stalks, juice, syrup, or sugar. It was very simple, and I hope some one will repeat it, as it is not too late to do so now.

I took corn-stalks from which "roastingears" had been gathered; for in those days we were careful not to waste anything that was catable. After stripping off the blades the stalks were chopped into pieces about two inches long, taking care to chop clear of the joints and throw them out; the stalks were then beat in a trough, as we used to beat apples for cider, and pressed; the juice obtained was boiled down to a proper consistency, being careful during the operation to stir it to keep it from burning, and skim off impurities.

My conclusion was that when the grain is in the milky state the corn-stalk, as high as the ear, or a little higher, is rich in saccharine matter, which would make it very valuable as a source of sugar supply, but that the difficulty of getting rid of the joint was so great that it would be impracticable-at least I was not encouraged to repeat the experiment the next fall or since. Perhaps, in this age of wonderful inventions, some machine may be invented to get rid of the joint with less trouble or labor. MEDICO. Richmond, October 15, 1878.

A Joke on a Physician. [From the New Orleans Picayune.] An amusing incident, which impugns the faithfulness of memory of one of our physicians, occurred a few days since.

The Esculapian referred to treated a man for the yellow-fever, and when his patient was well and out sent him his bill, amounting to a good round sum, for professional services rendered. The client, who considered the bill rather exorbitant, called on the doctor. He told the learned gentleman that he was not in unusually easy circumstances, and requested him to make a discount in the amount of the bill. "No, sir," replied the doctor; "I never cut down one of my bills; if you cannot pay it I will not ask you for it." This, of course, touched the patient to his inner-heart, but it was not what he had anticipated. He therefore replied that he did not ask for charity, but only a discount on the bill. The doctor, in answer, again said that he never cut down any of his bills. For many years he had been treating yellow-fever, and his fee was $100 and nothing under. If the bill could not be paid, well, his services were offered freely. There was, of course, no reply to be made, and the patient knew that it was useless to attempt to argue the question. Resigning himself to the necessity of paying the full amount, he changed the conversation, and inquired from the physician if a person who had been afflicted with yellew-fever during the epidemic of year. "Certainly not," was the reply of the doctor. The gentleman, in answer, said that he had had it, or at any rate that he had been treated for it. The doctor then replied that the person who treated him in real estate in some parts of the city. In a 1867 for yellow-fever was an incompetent locality where land sold two months ago or very impudent person. This was too much for the patient, who, however, did not lose his opportunity. He quietly remarked that he would refer to his papers, and ascertain who was the medical celebrity who had treated him for the fever during that endemine. Pulling a hundle of papers. himself.

OUR WONDERFUL PETROLEUM .- Twenty years ago this article was little known. The first artificial well was sunk in August, 1859, we believe. Now there is an annual production in this country of about 15,000,-000 barrels, and more than $60,000,000 worth is exported to other countries annually-our exports ranging in importance according to valuation-first, cotton; second, flour and grain; third, hog products (lard, hams, and sait pork); and fourth, petroleum. There are more than 10,000 oil-wells flowing or being sunk, and probably over $10,000,-000 invested in the business, in one way and another. Fifteen million barrels (forty gallons to the barrel) of this earth-yielded oil would fill 9,600,000,000 lamps holding half a pint each, or about seven such lamps for every man, woman, and child on our globe. If these lamps were equally distributed, so that every four persons could have one, and allow half a pint of oil to conversation be said: "My dear, how many these lamps were could be sufficient to the conversation be said: "My dear, how many conversation be said: "My dear, how many the conversation be said: "My dear, how many conversation be said: "My dea burn three evenings on an average (short nights included), the 15,000,000 barrels of oil would light up the whole human race for a period of three months, or a fourth of the population of the globe than twenty years, during which time we have not only used all the petroleum we have wanted ourselves, but have sent to other lands nearly $500,000,000 worth, at the low custom-house valuation. Paris, September 24.—One of the most remarkable cases of bank-note forgery which has come before the public for many a year past is now being tried at the Assizes of the Seine; and as the forgeries have been committed on the Bank of France, whose notes pass through everybody's hands, foreign as well as French, the details of the affair will be found both useful and interesting to all readers.

From the year 1872 the Bank of France. notwithstanding the active surveillance it exercises over the circulation of its notes and the special police it employs for that purpose, perceived that false notes had found their way into its coffers. In vain did the bank, as well as the police authorities, send out their sharpest detectives in search of the forgers; no traces of them could be obtained. In vain did the bank publish in the newspapers the various defective signs by which the counterfeit paper might be detected; on the contrary, these indications only aided the forgers, who at once rectified the defects, and eventually attained such a degree of perfection that the bank clerks themselves were almost

The forgeries, which were begun in 1872, were only in the first instance applied to the 20-franc notes, of which the bank received no fewer than 2,546, or a total amount of 59,920 francs. Alarmed at this state of things, the bank ceased the circulation of 20-franc notes. The forgers then took to making 50-franc notes, and got rid of about 35,000 francs' worth. They afterward fabricated 100-franc notes to the amount of 150,-000 francs, but before they had time to pass off all of them they were caught. The forgeries bad now gone on successfully for nearly six years, when one afternoon a young man named Gaston Jobet was arrested at the Magasins du Louvre in the act of tendering counterfeit notes. Jobet, who was only eighteen years old, was most fashionably dressed; he had driven up in a cab to purchase some gloves and neckties, but the cashier was too sharp for him. He detected the forged paper, and Jobet was at once handed over to the police, who found a large sum of money and a roll of counterfeit notes on his person. Jobet gave the address of his grandmother in the Rue du Bac as his lodging, hoping thereby to save his accomplices; but the detectives ferreted out the cabman who had driven the young man about to various places, and, thanks to his information, they discovered that Jobet really lived at Neuilly, just outside Paris, with his mother. On making a sudden descent on the house the police succeeded in capturing the whole gang, which comprised nine persons, nearly all members of two families connected with one another.

The chief of the gang was Joseph Barreau, whose mistress, Josephine Jobet, was the sister of the first individual arrested. On the premises were found five bundred counterfeit notes of various amounts and £300 sterling in gold, the proceeds of false notes already passed off. One of the persons arrested. Mile. Philomene Barreau, was only sixteen years old; she had just obtained the first prize for the piano at the Conservatoire, but as it was evident that the poor girl was an entire stranger to the service last Sunday. While the choir was doings of her family she was released and allowed to return to her musical studies. berry, who was sitting within three pews The inquiry which followed resulted in the of Miss McConnell, suddenly picked up a disclosure of some romantic details in conhymn-book and threw it at her with all the nection with the existence of the two fami-

Of a dreamy, passionate, fensive man, but it is now believed that his unbridled character, Barreau, who had mind is to some degree impaired. He has made the acquaintance of his mistress at an early age, resorted to forgery to satisfy her expensive tastes; but previously he had tried his luck at the gaming-table, and had visited most of the villes d'eaux with Josephine Jobet. After fighting as a soldier Peter, and probably a hearing will be had during the war, he joined the ranks of the Commune, and when the insurrection was quelled he escaped abroad. He went first of all to Hamburg, where he lost the little money he possessed at the tapis vert.

His passion for gambling appears to be hereditary. His father passed most of his ime over rouge-et-noir, and Joseph Barreau himself was born in one of the towns beond the Rhine where trente-et-quarante flourished. While abroad he formed the equaintance of a certain Conrad Dombrowski, a Polish musician, to whom he disclosed his projects, and who advanced him the funds necessary to begin work. Barreau did not issue his first forged notes till after long and patient study. He engraved on stone, and made his own blue ink. He forced his young brother, Jean Marie, who afterward turned musician, to become an apprentice to an engraver and printer, in order to make use of him later as a colleague. The mother and father of his mistress were employed to change the notes in Paris; a girl named Hermance Moisson was specially charged to do the same in the provinces; in short, he recruited quite a personnel, chiefly from his own family and that of his mistress, to carry on his forging schemes. The prisoners at the bar are eight in number-four men and four women. They are all fashionably dressed. Dombrowski alleges that he knew nothing about the forgery, and says he received the notes in payment for the money he had advanced Barreau, believing the said notes to be with yellew-fever during the epidemic of genuine. It is calculated that Joseph Bar-1867 could again have the same fever this reau made about 100,000 francs out of his forgeries during the six years.

that epidemic. Pulling a bundle of papers not for sale, as it was paying better than from his pocket he looked over them, and coolly handed over a receipt for seventy-five dollars for treatment of yellow-fever in 1867, and lo! it was signed by the doctor himself.
